Biblical Christmas Tree

The story of the Jesse tree—or rather its inspiration—comes from Isaiah’s prophecy, “There shall come forth a shoot from the stump of Jesse” (Isaiah 11:1). Jesse is King David’s father and so an ancestor of Jesus (“of the House of David”).

Tradition has taken Isaiah’s suggestion of Jesus’ “family tree” and decorated it with ornaments or pictures representing various ancestors (like Noah, Jacob, Moses, Ruth, Jesse himself, and David, of course). Jesus’ spiritual heritage is thus illustrated and celebrated.

Bilocation

The apparition of a saint in two different places at the same time, as in the reported appearance of St. Anthony at the same time in the pulpit and in a distant friary choir.

Nativity Relics

The Roman Basilica of St. Mary major has been known as “St. Mary at the Manager” since the seventh century. It has long contained legendary nativity relics: five small Levantine sycamore boards, said to be part of Christ’s original crib (no matter that Jerome, according to a fifth-century Christmas homily of his, believed that it was made of clay, a pottery “trough” that would actually be more in Keeping with Palestine custom of the day).

Odor of Sanctity

A pleasant odor that was emitted from the body of a saint, especially after death or disinterment, was believed by medieval people to be evidence of sanctity: a symbol of the fragrance of extraordinary virtue. St. Francis’s stigmata reportedly emitted a sweet perfume on occasion. The water in which the body of St. Teresa of Avila was bathed as she was prepared for burial retained a pleasing fragrance; for nine months a mysterious perfume arose from her grave. See St. Paul’s use of an aromatic metaphor in 2 Corinthians 2:15.
