Reflection:

Busy only in the immediate achievement of greater well-being and attracted by small aspirations and hopes, we run the risk of impoverishing the horizon of our existence by losing the longing for eternity. There are two facts that it is not difficult to verify in this new millennium in which we have lived for a few years. On the one hand, the expectation and desire for a better world is growing in human society. We are not satisfied with just anything: we need to progress towards a more dignified, humane and happy world. On the other hand, disenchantment, skepticism and uncertainty about the future are growing. There is so much absurd suffering in the lives of people and peoples, so many poisoned conflicts, such abuses against the planet, that it is not easy to maintain faith in the human being. Who will save us from aging, inevitable death, or the strange power of evil? It is not surprising that many begin to feel the need for something that is neither technique nor science nor ideological doctrine. The human being resists living locked up forever in this expired and deadly condition. However, not a few Christians today live looking exclusively at the earth. Apparently, we dare not look up beyond the immediate of each day. In the midst of questions and uncertainties, the followers of Jesus continue to walk through life, worked by a confidence and a conviction. When life seems to be closing or dying, God remains. The ultimate mystery of reality is a mystery of Goodness and Love. God is an open Door to life that no one can close.
